

Mogridge Shuts Out Chicago White Sox

Yankee Southpaw Allows Invading Team Only Two Hits.

Eddie Collins Fans THREE TIMES IN ROW

Old Roy Hartzell a Prominent Factor in Bringing Victory to Home Nine.

By FRANK O'NEILL.

Eddie Collins, field captain of the Chicago White Sox, struck out three times in four trips to the plate at the Polo Grounds yesterday afternoon.

When a slugger of his recognized capabilities failed so dismally, it is of slight wonder that the rest of the Windy City athletes were as pygmies in the hands of George Mogridge, and getting two scratch hits, were defeated in the final game of the series with the Yankees.

The performance of Mogridge bespoke the master. He allowed only two hits, and they were fakes. In the fifth inning Buck Weaver rolled one down to Peckinpah, which took a crazy hop off the shortstop's shins and bounced into left field for a single.

A Crazy Throw.

That was the first semblance of a safety that the Sox made from the left-handed mysteries of Mogridge that slipped up to and over the plate in wonderful style. In the eighth inning, Muller tapped a bunt to the box that could not be fielded in time. Mogridge saw fit to make a crazy throw of this roller, and McMullen went to second. That was the extent of Chicago's attack.

During the entire game, just two Chicago men penetrated the lines as far as the midway, and Buck Weaver alone got so far as third. In the second frame Fournier was out at first on a grounder to the box, and Joe Jackson drew a pass. Weaver forced Shoeless Joe at second, making two out. The broke away to steal second, and McMullen hooked one down to Pipp. He was safe when Mogridge dropped the first baseman's throw, and Weaver ran the way to third.

Had the crowd realized that this was the only time that a pale hosed warrior would reach the far turn in the course of the game, there might have been cheers. But there were none. Shortly thereafter Weaver was out at the plate on an attempted double steal.

But the big southpaw did not finish the game he began so well. In the eighth inning he was forced to retire. Bob Shawkey relieved him and brought the game to a bang-up close. It was said last night that the injury to the pitcher's arm was not serious, and that he would be back in the game shortly. He gave a couple of bases on balls, but struck out seven men.

While Mogridge was holding the fort so admirably, Danforth, the left-hander who saw service with the Philadelphia Athletics once, tried vainly to guard the plate for the White Sox. His efforts were his hard, but for one reason or another only two runs were made off the eight safeties the Yankees tore from him.

Three Hits in First.

Three hits were bunched in the first frame, but only one run resulted, and three more were grouped in the fourth for another run. Had Danforth been left on the mound, there is no telling where the stirring events might have stopped, but Tex Russell was called into the game, and he soon put an end to hilarity.

The game was strangely devoid of thrills. Baker did make a leaping catch of a liner by Jack Collins which cut off a possible two-base hit, and Roy Hartzell, the veteran of the Yankees, made a catch of Ray Schalk's slicing drive to right field. Hartzell ran in for the ball, but in taking it fell and turned over twice. Roy overtook Sox pitcher Tex Russell, who had taken three turns, which are allowed in any man's country. In any event, Roy held the ball.

Down in Waco this spring Ellis Hardy declared that if Al Walters failed to deliver for the Yankees he would never best the stock of another youngster. Walters is more than making good on the nice things that were said of him. He is only a youngster, and is slight in physique, but he is refuting the contention that catchers must be big men.

Two hits yesterday afternoon in three times at the bat, and caught a clever game. He got ten put-outs, and broke up the only steal attempted. He certainly looks like a catcher, and he certainly looks like a man who has nothing to do. It was not to be expected, with Mogridge serving a brand of forked lightning that simply could not be hit. Fritz Maisek got two put-outs and Roy Hartzell got two more. Joe Gedeon made a high throw on a simple chance, thus giving a life to Jack Collins in the ninth inning, but nothing came of it.

Hartzell's Sizzler.

Hartzell began the game by shooting a sizzler at the legs of Jacques Fournier, which not only made him let go by him. Lee Magee hit one a mile or more into left field, but Jack Collins was in the way when it dropped. That drive alone was enough to prove that there are a lot of men in baseball. Hartzell took third when Maisek came through on the hit and run two put-outs into left field and Baker managed to beat out an infield hit, scoring Hartzell.

The stage was set for a big inning in the fourth. Wallie Pipp stepped up and hit one far over the dome of thought of one Happy Felsch that went for three bases. Only the remarkable speed with which the Sox outfielders backed up prevented this from going for a circuit clout.

Roger Peckinpah tried for a hit, but Jack Collins caught his long fly to left. Pipp scored easily. Walters and Mogridge singled in succession then, and the crowd howled the bloody cry. Clarence Rowland declared himself again the measure and he sent Tex Russell into the hole. That drive alone was enough to prove that there are a lot of men in baseball. Hartzell took third when Maisek came through on the hit and run two put-outs into left field and Baker managed to beat out an infield hit, scoring Hartzell.

Free passes by Rosenthal and two misplays enabled Trinity to count twice. Baldwin, at first base, handled his chances cleverly, besides making two safeties.
